Long summer days mean more time for a treasure hunt, where we solve clues and save letters for use later.

Heading for an area known to a geographer as Epidium Promontorium, our trail starts to its northwest, at probably the country's oldest standing mainland castle (12th century). It was likely the handiwork of Sven the Red.

We open the first clue: "Two miles south-southwest to a ruined 13th-century chapel (save letter two), famous for its grave slabs." It's hard to miss; we take a photograph to prove it. We open clue two. "Crows fly 10 miles southeast to this village (save letter two). Cars drive about three times that." Along extremely narrow roads, it should be added.

Eventually, we arrive and open clue three. "To a novelist (Christian name: letter three), born here in 1879, this place was Brieston." It's hard to photograph a dead novelist, so we take another of the village. Clue four is also set in the village. "He must have done it barefoot. An 11th-century king (first name: letter three) was carried in his boat across land here." Not many kings do that, so we take a picture of a, er, boat.

We open the next clue. "There's a castle seven miles south-southeast, possibly built by Sven the Red, or possibly his son (first name: letter three). A circuitous and enjoyable 14-mile drive gets us there, and a picture is soon in the can.

At last, the final clue. "Catch the ferry, 15 miles southwest. Rearrange your saved letters to find where it will take you — the Isle of *****. It's a 20-minute crossing and we'll be waiting there for you." But only if we don't miss the boat.
